

Blade battery 2.0 launched, but maybe not enough

Quick Note

Key event on update for second-generation blade battery

BYD hosted its blade battery 2.0 update event on March 5. During the event, BYD introduced its second-gen blade battery, posting a milestone moment for its battery technology since 2020, when it had last launched as blade battery 1.0.

With the blade battery 2.0, BYD's vehicles can achieve 10-70% battery charge within five minutes, 10-97% battery charge within nine mins in normal temperatures and 20-97% battery charge within 12 mins in extremely cold weather condition (e.g., -20°C). In addition, BYD is able to achieve a pure battery CLTC range of 1,036km with its blade battery 2.0 for the upcoming new Denza Z9GT.

To unleash the full potential of blade battery 2.0, BYD also introduced its new integrated system for energy storage and charging. This will help cars with blade battery 2.0 to experience ultra-fast charging and also store the electricity needed for batteries beforehand. BYD targets to have 20k super-fast charging stations by end-2026 (compared with 4,239 stations currently), with 18k cooperating with current charging station operators and 2k to be deployed on the highway.

In addition to revealing its game-changing technology, BYD introduced the first batch of its new models in 2026, which will start to use its new blade battery. (Fig. 1). Besides enjoying a super-fast charging experience, BYD also provided those models with 12 months (18 months for Song Ultra) of free ultra-fast charging for customers who place orders now.

A new trump card released by the market leader, but maybe not good enough to fully turn around the entire business situation; more update awaits

While the new blade battery 2.0 can address and resolve key concerns that customers might have around charging speed and efficiency, it will also make the NEV vehicles comparable to ICE cars in regard to charging efficiency, therefore, we believe this will potentially help BYD gain more orders. However, on the one hand it will take some time for BYD to establish its charging facilities within China before a significant amount of customers can enjoy such charging experience. More importantly, we view the challenges BYD has faced since last year as more complicated, not only from the perspective of the BEV market but from the PHEV angle as well, especially for the market below CNY150k. We noted that during the event, there is limited update for PHEV models and technology update while all new/facelift vehicles starting from CNY150k and above. We believe BYD will need to put more effort into its PHEV product mix or technology and those models below CNY150k market, where the company had a strong presence in the past. Consequently, our initial take is that although the event was positive, it was not good enough to turn around the market competition dynamics for BYD at one take. We think more effort will be needed, either from the technology side or from 2026 new models update. We suggest investors be patient and follow up on the company's further steps in the market.
